

Diasporas and Secessionist Conflicts: Mobilization of the Albanian, Armenian, and Chechen Diasporas

Koinova, Maria

Postprint / Postprint

Zeitschriftenartikel / journal article

Zur Verfügung gestellt in Kooperation mit / provided in cooperation with:

www.peerproject.eu

Empfohlene Zitierung / Suggested Citation:

Koinova, M. (2010). Diasporas and Secessionist Conflicts: Mobilization of the Albanian, Armenian, and Chechen Diasporas. Ethnic and Racial Studies, 34(2), 333-356. <https://doi.org/10.1080/01419870.2010.489646>

Nutzungsbedingungen:

Dieser Text wird unter dem "PEER Licence Agreement zur Verfügung" gestellt. Nähere Auskünfte zum PEER-Projekt finden Sie hier: <http://www.peerproject.eu> Gewährt wird ein nicht exklusives, nicht übertragbares, persönliches und beschränktes Recht auf Nutzung dieses Dokuments. Dieses Dokument ist ausschließlich für den persönlichen, nicht-kommerziellen Gebrauch bestimmt. Auf sämtlichen Kopien dieses Dokuments müssen alle Urheberrechtshinweise und sonstigen Hinweise auf gesetzlichen Schutz beibehalten werden. Sie dürfen dieses Dokument nicht in irgendeiner Weise abändern, noch dürfen Sie dieses Dokument für öffentliche oder kommerzielle Zwecke vervielfältigen, öffentlich ausstellen, aufführen, vertreiben oder anderweitig nutzen.

Mit der Verwendung dieses Dokuments erkennen Sie die Nutzungsbedingungen an.

Terms of use:

This document is made available under the "PEER Licence Agreement". For more information regarding the PEER-project see: <http://www.peerproject.eu> This document is solely intended for your personal, non-commercial use. All of the copies of this documents must retain all copyright information and other information regarding legal protection. You are not allowed to alter this document in any way, to copy it for public or commercial purposes, to exhibit the document in public, to perform, distribute or otherwise use the document in public.

By using this particular document, you accept the above-stated conditions of use.

Diasporas and Secessionist Conflicts:
Mobilization of the Albanian, Armenian, and Chechen Diasporas

Journal:	Ethnic and Racial Studies
Manuscript ID:	RERS-2008-0051.R2
Manuscript Type:	Original Manuscript
Keywords:	Diaspora, Secessionism, Mobilization, Radicalization, Balkans, Caucasus

Diasporas and Secessionist Conflicts: The Mobilization of the Armenian, Albanian, and Chechen Diasporas

Revised Submission, April 23, 2010

Abstract

This article examines the impact of diasporas on secessionist conflicts, focusing on the Albanian, Armenian, and Chechen diasporas and the conflicts in Kosovo, Karabakh and Chechnya during the 1990s. How do diasporas radicalize these conflicts? I argue that despite differences in diaspora communal characteristics and the types of the secessionist conflicts, a common pattern of mobilization develops. Large-scale diasporic support for secessionism emerges only after independence is proclaimed by the local elites. From that point onwards diasporas become engaged in a conflict spiral, and transnational coalitions are formed between local secessionist and diaspora groups. Depending on the organizational strength of the local strategic center and the diasporic institutions, these coalitions endure or dissipate. Diasporas exert radicalization influences on the conflict spiral on two specific junctures – when grave violations of human rights occur in the homeland and when local moderate elites start losing credibility that they can achieve the secessionist goal.

Keywords: diaspora, secessionism, mobilization, radicalization, Balkans, Caucasus

Introduction

Scholars on civil wars and secessionism are increasingly interested in the relationship between diaspora mobilization and secessionist conflicts. Domestic level explanations do not sufficiently explain the onset, duration, and termination of civil wars. Starting in the 1990s studies asserted that international actors – such as kin-states, refugees, distant and regional powers, and international organizations – influence the course and outcomes of secessionism. Mounting empirical evidence demonstrated that conflict-generated diasporas – such as the Albanian, Armenian, Irish, Tamil, and Palestinian – helped to perpetuate conflicts. The growing pace of globalization created more opportunities for diasporas to establish viable linkages to their homelands via the Internet, global media, and inexpensive transportation. Understanding diaspora mobilization with regard to secessionist conflicts became a theoretical necessity.

This article assesses the impact of conflict-generated diasporas on secessionist conflicts by offering theoretical innovation in three ways. First, while a number of studies analyzed either diaspora politics or secessionism, this study combines both and focuses on diaspora mobilization vis-à-vis local elites. Secondly, case studies on diasporas and secessionist conflicts exist, but lack systematic comparison. This article derives common patterns for diaspora mobilization by comparing three different cases of conflict-generated diasporas – the Albanian, Armenian, and Chechen – and their linkages to secessionist conflicts in the Balkans and the Caucasus. Finally, this study is the first to explore the timing and sequencing of transformative events during diaspora mobilization.

The overarching question addressed is: how do diasporas exert a radicalizing impact on the secessionist conflicts of their homelands? The study also examines

1
2
3 whether diasporas start secessionist conflicts and whether diasporas become 4
5 radicalized themselves.
6
7

8 I review the emerging literature on diasporas and conflicts and established 9
10 accounts on external actors and internal conflicts. Then I explain the value of the 11
12 transnational social movements literature for the study of diaspora mobilization, lay 13
14 out the research design and introduce the cases. I argue that despite differences in 15
16 diaspora communal characteristics and the secessionist conflict types, a common 17
18 pattern of mobilization develops. Large-scale diasporic support for secessionism 19
20 emerges only after independence is proclaimed by local elites. From that point 21
22 onwards diasporas become engaged in a conflict spiral, and transnational coalitions 23
24 are formed between local secessionist and diaspora groups. Depending on the 25
26 organizational strength of the local strategic center and the diasporic institutions, these 27
28 coalitions endure or dissipate. Diasporas exert radicalizing influences on homeland 29
30 politics at two junctures – when grave violations of human rights occur in the 31
32 homeland and when local moderate elites start losing credibility that they can achieve 33
34 the secessionist goal.
35
36 37
38
39 40
41
42

43 Major theoretical accounts

44
45
46 The emerging scholarship on diasporas and conflicts goes back to 47
48
49
50 Collier and Hoeffler's influential statistical study demonstrating that civil wars 51
52
53 resist resolution if they are linked to large diasporas (2000). Stateless 54
55
56 diasporas are more likely to remain involved with homeland politics as long as 57
58
59
60 the nationalist struggle continues (Sheffer 2003). Diasporas generated by

1
2
3
4 conflicts rather than by voluntary migration are especially likely to maintain a 5
6
7
8 trauma of displacement and a myth of return that durably link them to a 9
10
11 homeland territory (Scheffer 2003, Lyons 2006). Diasporas – such as the 12
13
14 Jewish and Armenian – may develop interests differing from those of the local 15
16
17 elites in order to preserve their own diasporic identity (Shain 2002).
18
19 20

21
22 Some authors of particular case studies (Albanian, Croatian, Ethiopian, 23
24
25 Irish, Tamil) captured practices of diaspora engagement with internal conflicts.
26
27
28
29
30
31 32
33
34 35
36 37
38
39 40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47 48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60
Diasporas send labor remittances and humanitarian aid, recruit fighters, lobby homeland governments and international organizations, disseminate propaganda, stage demonstrations, and tap into resources of criminal networks (Byman 2001, Hockenos 2003).

61
62
63
64
65
66
67
68
69
70
71
72
73
74
75
76
77
78
79 80
81
82
83
84
85
86
87
88 89
90
91
92
93
94
95
96
97
98
99
100
The deficiencies of this literature, focused specifically on case studies, lead us to draw theoretical insights from more established accounts on external actors and internal conflicts. External actors intervene due to instrumentalist motives that include geopolitical interests, political and economic gains, military concerns, and gaining negotiating leverage (Heraclides 1990, Taras and Ganguly 2006). Affective motivations relate to

1
2
3
4 self-esteem established through national, religious, or racial identification,
5
6
7
8 historic or recently inflicted injustice, and humanitarian considerations
9
10
11 (Heraclides 1990, Carment and James 2000). Locked into domestic 12
13
14 competition, leaders in states external to the conflict use their constituencies' 15
16
17
18 ethnic ties to advance their domestic agendas and induce their states to 19
20
21 intervene in the conflict (Saideman 2001). With their identity-based ties, kin-22
23
24 states are often bound in an interactive 'triadic nexus' with nationalizing states and 25
26
27 minorities, where signals from one influence the behavior of others (Brubaker 1996, 28
29
30 Jenne 2007). Moreover, in separatist and irredentist crises where the institutional 31
32
33 constraints in the homeland are low, transnational ethnic ties become 34 35
36
37 important for local actors to exploit (Carment et al. 2006).
38
39

40
41 Diasporas are identity-based actors like kin-states, but do they 42
43
44 intervene in similar ways? Generational differences within diasporas matter, 45
46
47
48 and both powerful individuals and institutions exert major influence. Thus, 49
50
51
52 some scholars turn for theoretical leverage to scholarship on transnational 53
54
55 social movements, allowing to unpack the term 'diaspora' and to delineate 56
57
58
59 patterns and mechanisms linking the local and the global: 'Boomerang effects' 60

1
2
3
4 and 'spirals' are used to pressure authoritarian regimes to adopt human rights
5
6
7 change (Keck and Sikkink 1998, Risse 1999). Local issues are reframed to 8
9
10 appeal to global actors and vice versa (Bob 2005, Tarrow 2005). Coalitions 11
12
13 and networks develop across borders (Della Porta et al. 2005). The opening 14
15
16 of local and global political opportunity structures affects various types of 17
18
19 mobilization (Sikkink 2005). Mechanisms—such as attribution of opportunity 20
21
22 and threat, frame alignment and brokerage—concatenate in the transnational 23
24
25 realm (McAdam et al. 2001, Tarrow 2005). A combination of injustice and 26
27
28 hope becomes an important emotional referent for the launching of social 29
30
31 32
33
34 35
36 37
38
39 40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47 48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59 60 war and repression often trigger the use of violence.

43
44
45
46
47 48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60
Few scholars of diaspora politics emphasize the particularistic identity-based character of diaspora mobilization in contrast to the universalistic solidarities binding other transnational social movements. They apply some building blocks of social movement theory to the identity-based character of diaspora politics (Wayland 2004, Smith and Stares 2007). Adamson discusses causal mechanisms operating during diaspora mobilization.

1
2
3
4 'Transnational brokerage' builds on McAdam et al (2001) understanding that 5
6
7
8 'brokerage' is the linking of two or more previously unconnected social sites
9
10
11 by a unit that mediates their relations with one another or with other sites.

12
13
14 'Ethnic outbidding' takes place 'when parties or elites attempt to outdo each other, 15
16
17 leading to a cycle of polarization that fuels extremism' (Adamson 2009).
18
19 20 21
22
23

24 Research Design and Introduction of Cases

25
26
27 The term diaspora is used with Brubaker's (2005) understanding that 28
29
30 diaspora is 'a category of practice, project, claim and stance, rather than as a 31
32
33 bounded group.' A diaspora is not simply constituted of the number of 34
35
36 immigrants of various generations, but only of those who pro-actively make 37
38
39 claims about their descent. The term is also limited to include only ethno-40
41
42 national groups residing outside territories adjacent to the homeland, which 43
44
45
46
47
48
49 Anderson (1998) calls 'long-distance nationalists'.
50
51

52
53 I adopt two more definitions. Secessionism is 'an attempt by an ethnic 54
55
56 group claiming homeland to withdraw with its territory from the authority of a 57
58
59 larger state of which it is a part' (Horowitz 1991). Secessionism often occurs 60

1
2
3
4 alongside irredentism, understood either as the demand of a kin-state to 5
6
7 incorporate into its territory co-nationals living in another state, or as the 8
9
10 desire of an ethnic group inhabiting territories outside the kin-state to seek 11
12
13 reunion (Chazan 1991). I introduce the two terms in order to consider the Armenian 14
15
16 case where secessionism occurs first and is followed by de facto if not de jure
17
18 19 20 21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31 32
33
34 35
36 37
38
39 40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47 48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

This study's scope is limited to cases of conflict-generated diasporas linked to secessionist conflicts in the post-communist world. These cases are characterized by a common point of departure of secessionism in 1989-1991, communist institutional legacies, and the lack of durable linkages between diaspora populations in the West and their ethnic brethren in the East during the Cold War. These characteristics distinguish these diasporas from others linked to secessionism in Africa and Asia, where conflicts stem from decolonization. The Tamil diaspora has been mobilized for the secessionist movement in Sri Lanka since the 1970s. The Sikh diaspora supported Khalistan's secession from India in the 1980s. The Kurdish diaspora in Europe has been mobilized in support of territorial demands in southern Turkey since the 1980s. The Israeli and Palestinian diasporas have supported their ethnic brethren in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict since the late 1940s. While my findings could be further tested on the larger population of cases, this study makes a theoretical contribution by unpacking undiscovered processes of diaspora mobilization vis-a-vis secessionism in comparative perspective.

I select the Albanian, Armenian, and Chechen diasporas on a control variable. The conflicts stem from autonomist regions in ethno-national federations (former

1
2
3 Soviet Union and former Yugoslavia), where an ethno-national system of government
4 was institutionalized. Kosovo was a constituent unit of Serbia, Karabakh of 5 Azerbaijan, and Chechnya of Russia. Institutional organization on an ethno-national 6 basis is considered a prerequisite for minority secessionist demands when totalitarian
7 regimes open to competitive politics (Bunce 1999). Unlike titular republics whose 8 nationalities were entitled to a right to self-determination, autonomous regions 9 enjoyed self-government on an ethno-national basis, but no self-
10 determination. Thus, they became especially susceptible to violent secession.
11
12 Serbia, Azerbaijan and Russia employed repressive practices respectively in 13 Kosovo (1991-1999), Karabakh (1991-1994), and Chechnya (1991-2003).
14
15
16
17
18 19 20 21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31 32
33

34 The secessionist conflicts and diaspora characteristics differ significantly. The 35 Kosovo and Chechen conflicts are characterized by 'secessionism only', while 36 the Karabakh conflict is mixed with irredentism.¹ The Kosovo and Karabakh 37 cases involve a kin-state (Albania, Armenia), while there is none in the 38 Chechen case. A kin-state can act in favor of secessionism. In its absence, 39 secessionists may solicit more support from the diaspora. The dynamic of 40 large-scale violence also differs. In Karabakh violence ensued almost 41 immediately following the declaration of independence. In Kosovo it occurred 42
43
44
45
46
47 48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3
4 after a non-violent secessionist movement had lost domestic support.
5
6

7 Violence erupted in Chechnya after a local movement declared independence
8

9
10 and after Chechnya's status was not resolved despite a de facto Chechen 11

12
13
14
15 victory in the first war.
16

17
18 The three diasporas also differ. The Armenian is the oldest and most 19 20 institutionalized. It originated in the 11th century, but its identity was defined by 21

22
23
24 the 1915 genocide when around 1, 5 million Armenians were massacred in 25

26
27 the collapsing Ottoman Empire (Tölölyan 2000). Dispersed populations settled 28

29
30
31 in the Middle East, and later in Western Europe and the US (Panossian 1998).
32

33
34
35 Few emigrants came from Armenia proper and Karabakh. They started 36

37
38 migrating en masse only in the 1990s due to the war in Karabakh and 39

40
41
42 Armenia's drastic economic decline. At present the Armenian diaspora is 43

44
45
46 global, with large communities residing in Russia, the US, France, Georgia 47

48
49 and Lebanon.² Nevertheless, its diasporic identity and institutions are defined 50

51
52
53 by an older generation linked to the 1915 genocide. The most influential 54

55
56
57 diaspora group is the Armenian Revolutionary Federation (ARF), widely 58

59
60 known as 'Dashnaks', facing a few weak opponents (Panossian 1998).

1
2
3
4 The Albanian diaspora is more recent and less institutionalized.
5
6
7
8 Albanians started migrating only in the late 19th century. They settled mostly in 9
10
11 the US, while during communism 'guest-worker' programs for Yugoslav 12
13
14 citizens allowed Kosovo Albanians to work in Western Europe. Economic 15
16
17
18 crisis in Albania and Macedonia and repression in Kosovo in the 1990s 19 20
21
22 created the largest Albanian emigration wave. Albania alone sent around 23
24
25
26 900,000 people abroad (Kosta 2004). The estimated more than 1 million 27
28
29 Albanian emigrants are concentrated in the US, Switzerland, Germany, 30
31
32 Greece, Italy and Turkey.³ Unlike the globally defined Armenian diaspora 33
34
35
36 institutions, the Albanian ones are more specific to nation-states. Before 1990 37
38
39 their strongest presence was in the US, most notably the Pan-Albanian 40
41
42
43 organization, Vatra (Hockenos 2003).
44
45

46
47 The Chechen diaspora is the most recent and least institutionalized. Hostilities 48
49
50
51 between Ottomans and Russians in the 19th century prompted Chechens to 52
53
54 relocate to adjacent regions and territories of present-day Turkey, Jordan, 55
56
57
58 Syria and Iraq (Kailani 2002, Shishani and Moore 2005). Large-scale 59 60 emigration did not take place until Josef Stalin inaugurated forced

1
2
3
4 deportations within the Soviet Union in 1944, which left a large Chechen
5
6
7
8 community in present-day Kazakhstan and a collective trauma associated with 9
10
11 exile. During communism Chechens also moved to Russia.⁴ Due to the wars 12
13
14 of the 1990s, Chechens moved to the US and Western Europe, establishing 15
16
17 some presence in Denmark and Germany. The Chechen diaspora in Moscow 18
19
20 remained the most influential. Diasporic institutions were weak if at all formally 21
22
23 organized.
24
25
26

27
28
29 If the secessionist conflicts and diasporic characteristics are different, 30
31
32 but patterns of diaspora mobilization are similar, then it is theoretically 33
34
35 interesting to unpack the processes leading to this common mobilization. I do 36
37
38 not aim to explain the radicalization of domestic politics by weighing the 39
40
41 causal impact of diasporas' influences against other potential domestic or 42
43
44 external factors, but to understand the process of diaspora mobilization and 45
46
47 how it exerts radicalization influences on local politics. Hence, the dependent 48
49
50 variable is 'diasporic radicalization impact'. I define it in line with McAdam et 51
52
53 al.'s (2001) understanding of radicalization as the capacity to aid local actors 54
55
56 to 'adopt more extreme political agendas and transgressive forms of 57
58
59
60

1
2
3
4 contention.' The Albanian diaspora exerted a radicalizing impact on the 5
6
7 Kosovo conflict by aiding the violence-oriented Kosovo Liberation Army (KLA)
8
9
10 in 1998-1999. The Armenian diaspora aided radical elements that ousted the 11
12 more democratically oriented Armenian President Ter Petrossian from power 13
14 in 1998. External Islamic elements aided the growth of radical Islamism in 15
16
17
18 Chechnya in 1996-1999.
19 20 21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29

30 ----- TABLE 1 HERE -----
31
32
33
34
35

36 The independent variable is a 'response to transformative events in the 37
38 homeland'. Under 'transformative events' social movement theory
39
40 understands turning points in a social movement that follow a period of 41
42 organizational work, but precede a 'take-off' of mobilization (Hess and Martin 43
44 2006). Considering social movements theory from the vantage point of 45
46
47 identity-based politics, I argue that these transformative events relate to 48
49
50 significant threats to diasporic identity – such as grave violations of human 51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60 rights – or to threats to deeply entrenched diaspora interests – such as threats

1
2
3
4 to the success of a secessionist project.
5
6

7 The study design is based upon a ‘structured focused comparison’ and the 8
9 ‘process tracing method’ (George and Bennett 2004). Overarching questions are asked 10
11 from the literature across cases, but the analysis is launched in line with a ‘within-12
13 case’ rather than ‘across-case’ comparison. Such methodology offers an alternative to 14
15 research designs where the requirements for a ‘perfectly controlled comparison’ are 16
17 not met, and is appropriate in designs where sequential logic—such as diaspora 18
19 mobilization—is the subject of research. Hence, the process-tracing method is used to 20
21 rule out alternative explanations and validate theoretical propositions at different steps 22
23 of the mobilization process rather than only at its outset, as a comparative study 24
25 utilizing Mill’s methods would do. This work is based on evidence gathered from 26
27 newspapers, archives, secondary accounts, and personally conducted semi-structured 28
29 interviews selected through snowball sampling.
30
31 32
33
34 35
36
37

38 Process 1: Diasporas Become Part of a Conflict Spiral

39
40 I assert that despite their different make-up, all three diasporas reacted to 41
42 secessionism, but did not cause it. Some individual diaspora members forged 43
44 connections with local secessionists prior to the 1991 declarations of independence, 45
46 but large-scale diaspora mobilization took place only in their aftermath. Weak 47
48 linkages between the East and the West during the Cold War, and immigrant circles’ 49
50 lack of capacity to engage with secessionism prevented diasporas from pro-active 51
52 involvement. Declaration of independence served as a focal point for mobilization and 53
54 triggered two mechanisms: identity-based response to local frames of injustice and 55
56 hope, and attribution of opportunity to secessionism.
57
58
59 60

----- FIGURE 1 HERE -----

1
2
3
4
5
6
7
8
9
10
11 12
13
14
15
16
17
18 19 20 21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31 32
33
34 35
36 37
38
39 40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47 48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

Diasporas had some social, but little political interaction with their ethnic brethren prior to the end of communism. The US and UK-based Armenian diaspora offered humanitarian aid to victims of the 1988 earthquake in Armenia. Kosovo Albanian guest workers traveled freely between Yugoslavia and Western Europe. A product of the diaspora, future Chechen president Dzhokhar Dudayev spent most of his life in Estonia and Kazakhstan, and returned to Chechnya shortly before the declaration of independence.

Nevertheless, linkages remained weak because the existing diaspora organizations were focused on issues other than secessionism. In the Armenian case, internal elite competition between Dashnaks and their opponents led each bloc to have its own Apostolic Churches, cultural and charity institutions (Panossian 1998). Their only point of unity – to resolve the Armenian national question within the confines of Soviet politics – was a strong common opposition to secessionism. Operating out of a traumatic diasporic identity, they claimed that secessionism could trigger hostilities with Russia, an age-old protector of Armenia, causing Turkey to intervene and initiate another Armenian genocide. Though linked with the homeland on the civil society level when supporting victims of the 1988 earthquake victims, the diaspora organizations were caught ‘completely off-guard’ by the 1988 explosion of the political movement in Karabakh (Libaridian 1999).

Atomization of diaspora circles in the Albanian case and loss of identity in the Chechen further discouraged diaspora members from a pro-active approach. Although Albanian hard-liners founded the Movement for Kosovo in

1
2
3
4 1982 to advocate armed revolt, many of its members died or were imprisoned
5
6
7 (Judah 2000). Unlike the Albanians or the Armenians, the Chechens had lost
8
9
10 the salience of their identity. In the Soviet Union they underwent strong 11
12
13 Russification with rapid assimilation of values, language and lifestyles, and 14
15
16 pressures to integrate into the Soviet economy (Payin and Popov 1996). In 17
18
19 Kazakhstan, the Chechens spoke their language primarily at home (Brauer 20
21
22 2002). In Turkey, they assimilated under the nationalist pressures of President 23
24
25 Kemal Attatürk in the late 1920s. Their identity was surprisingly preserved in 26
27
28
29 Jordan where nationalism was weak. But the Cold War divided Jordan from 30
31
32 the Soviet Union and linkages between their Chechen populations were 33
34 35
36 almost non-existent.
37
38
39 40

41
42
43 One can argue that these findings may not represent the universe of cases, 44
45 since the Cold War divide applied to other diasporas linked to the post-communist 46
47 world, but their mobilization was more advanced. Ukrainians lobbied the US
48
49 Congress and institutions to endorse Ukrainian independence despite fierce US
50
51 opposition. Croatian diaspora funds sponsored the nationalist opposition in the 1990
52
53 republican elections (Skrbic 2007). Nevertheless, even in these cases diasporic 54
55 support reacted to processes in the homeland. The diaspora did not mobilize for 56
57 secessionism, local strategists reached out to the diaspora first.
58
59
60

Locally proclaimed independence in 1991 became a focal point for diaspora

1
2
3 mobilization. In an international environment still defined by information deficiencies
4 across borders, diaspora entrepreneurs saw in the declaration of independence a 5 solution that seemed natural, special and relevant to them, a realization of 6 expectation.⁵ In all three cases, they quickly claimed support for secessionism.⁶
7
8
9

10
11
12 In the words of a Vienna-based Albanian activist, 'the [nationalist Democratic 13 League of Kosovo] LDK was finally saying what everybody wanted to hear 14 and the Kosovo Albanians in the diaspora flocked to it' (Hockenos 2003).
15
16
17

18 19 20 21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31 32
33
34 35
36 37
38
39 40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47 48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60
Despite their initial opposition to secessionism, the two Armenian blocs quickly backed Armenia's and Karabakh's 1991 independence (Panossian 1998). Chechens in the former Soviet Union participated in the 1991 elections, thus creating irregularities since they did not permanently reside in Chechnya (Payin and Popov 1995).

One can argue that declaration of independence could have been an external event without inducing diasporas to support secessionism. Yet, it became a transformative event because it triggered two mechanisms enabling the diasporas to enter a conflict spiral. First was the identity-based emotional response to messages of 'injustice', framed by local secessionists as measures to redress the political future of nations captivated by communist regimes. These messages were not necessarily targeted at long-distance diasporas, but were part of the overall mobilization strategies. Local elites promoted the right to national self-determination as a political alternative to communism. These messages resonated well with the conflict-generated

1
2
3 aspects of a diasporic identity locked into experiences of injustice. Armenians were 4 anchored in the 1915 genocide, Chechens in their 1944 deportation by Stalin, and 5 Kosovo Albanians in their exile from communism. However, as Gamson points out,
6 'injustice frames' cannot motivate for collective action alone unless they trigger
7 powerful emotions (1992). In these cases, the emotional referent was hope for change
8 that peaked across the former East-West divide in 1989-1991. As Aminzade and 9 McAdam argue, when reaction to injustice comes together with hope, social 10 movements are likely to take place (2001).
11
12
13
14
15
16
17
18 19 20
21

22 In these cases, an identity-based emotional identification triggered a second,
23 instrumentally-based mechanism, attribution of opportunity to secessionism. As 24 McAdam et al. (2001) claim, no opportunity would invite mobilization unless it is 25 visible and perceived as such by potential challengers. Secessionism was seen in 26 diaspora circles as the viable option to redress past injustices. In contrast to other East
27 European countries like Slovakia, Bulgaria or Romania, where minority autonomy or 28 integration were considered political alternatives, these options were ignored in these 29 three cases. Even the two Armenian blocs, initially opposed to secessionism, 30 supported it after 1991. Diaspora Albanians, who earlier associated with the 31 Movement for Kosovo, saw an opportunity to pursue a long-cherished independence 32 goal. Ruslan Khasbulatov, a power-broker of Chechen descent responsible for 33 Russian President Boris Yeltsin's Chechen policy, saw in the new Chechen President
34 Dudajev an ally against pro-Gorbachev elements in the central government.
35 Allegedly, he and Yeltsin ordered that demonstrations in support of Chechen
36 independence be spared a brutal encounter with the authorities (Lieven 1999). Hence, 37 identity-based emotional identification with injustice frames, followed by an 38 attribution of opportunity to secessionism made diasporas engage in a conflict spiral.
39 40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47 48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

Process 2: Building Transnational Coalitions

Tarrow (2005) demonstrated that coalitions across borders can be short-lived or durable, depending on the actors' intensity of involvement and the common identity developed through collective action. Transnational coalitions were formed in all three cases of this study, but had different durations. They lasted from 1991-1997 in the Kosovo case, from 1991-1992 in the Armenia/Karabakh case, and from 1991-1996 in the Chechen case. Coalitions operating in the context of secessionism differ significantly from those built around universalist claims, because a common identity between diasporas and secessionist elites precedes the collective action, rather than is developed by it. Moreover, the mechanism of brokerage (McAdam et al 2001, Adamson 2009) was instrumental in making local secessionists secure tangible support beyond rhetoric. Depending on the strength of the strategic center in the homeland vis-à-vis major diaspora organizations, these transnational coalitions became more or less viable.

The mediating unit in the brokerage mechanism is the strategic center linking networks in the homeland to the diaspora. I develop the term 'strategic

1
2
3
4 center' to designate not only secessionist elites, but power brokers who 5
6
7
8 pursue secessionist or irredentist strategies out of different territories. In the 9
10
11 Kosovo case, the strategic center was the shadow government, but it 12
13
14 operated out of two countries. President Ibrahim Rugova was based in 15
16
17 Kosovo, and Prime Minister Bujar Bukoshi was in Germany. Focusing their 18
19 20 efforts on receiving financial support for the shadow institutions and their non-21
22
23 violent strategy, Bukoshi and other activists paid numerous visits to cultural 24
25
26 societies, guest worker clubs, and provincial beer halls, where they formed 27
28
29 LDK branches (Hockenos 2003). As a result, in 1992-1995 new LDK offices 30
31
32 sprang up in the US, Canada, Australia, Turkey and European countries. In 33
34
35
36 the Armenian case, the strategic center was based in Armenia, but maintained 37
38
39 close links with Karabakh. Although Armenia refused to recognize Karabakh's 40
41
42 independence, it established a better relationship with its leaders in 1992, 43
44
45
46 intervened militarily on its behalf in the war with Azerbaijan, and reached out 47
48
49 to the diaspora (De Waal 1996). The Armenian National Movement (ANM)
50
51
52 government of President Ter Petrossian made a number of high profile 53
54
55
56 appointments of Armenian-Americans, such as Foreign Minister Raffi
57
58
59
60

1
2
3
4 Hovannissian and Secretary of the Security Council Gerard Libaridian
5
6
7 (Panossian 1998). It also formed the Armenian Fund to channel diaspora
8
9
10
11 contributions, including for infrastructural projects in Karabakh. The strategic 12
13
14 center was based in the secessionist region itself only in the Chechen case.
15
16
17
18 Dudayev forged relations primarily with Chechens in Russia.
19 20 21
22
23
24

25 -----FIGURE 2 HERE -----
26
27
28
29
30
31

32 Instrumental reasoning bound these transnational coalitions. In the 33
34
35 Kosovo case, the strategic center put little effort into converting already 36
37
38 existing diaspora institutions for its cause, but built its own branches abroad. It 39
40
41 remained strong vis-à-vis relatively weak diaspora institutions and became the 42
43
44 center of a coalition aligned with its goals. This approach confirms Fair's 45
46
47 observations that diaspora institutions formed specifically to support internal 48
49
50
51
52
53
54 conflict become more effective than those formed around a broader scope of 55
56
57 issues (Fair 2005). Old Albanian organizations like the US-based Vatra shifted 58
59 60 attitude in support of Kosovo over time, but the banner of secessionism was

1
2
3
4 carried by the new Albanian-American Civic League (AACL), linked to the 5
6
7 LDK. The interest of its leader, former Congressman Joe DioGuardi, was 8
9
10 initially to maintain his own political career with a meaningful cause abroad 11
12
13
14 (Hockenos 2003).
15

16
17
18 In the Armenian case, a weak transnational coalition emerged, since 19
20
21 the strategic center was relatively weak vis-à-vis diasporic institutions. The 22
23
24 ANM government wanted to take Armenia out of its post-Soviet isolation, and 25
26
27 sought international contacts including with the diaspora. Government and 28
29
30 diaspora interests started diverging early on in their collaboration. The first 31
32
33 issue emerged with Armenia's refusal to officially recognize Karabakh in order 34
35
36 to avoid being internationally implicated in irredentism. But the diaspora ARF
37
38
39 considered Karabakh the place holding the true values of 'Armenianness', 40
41
42 unlike Armenia proper, and accused the ANM of 'abandoning Karabakh' 43
44
45
46
47 (Panossian 1998). Although the diaspora initially took a back seat in 48
49
50
51
52
53
54 influencing policy, it established its own local parties in both Armenia and 55
56
57 Karabakh. Dashnak-based organizations such as the Armenian General
58
59
60 Benevolence Union, the Armenian Assembly of America, and the Armenian-

1
2
3
4 French singer Charles Aznavour became quickly involved in homeland affairs.
5
6

7
8 In the Chechen case, both the strategic center and diaspora
9
10 organizations were weak and created loose transnational relationships. From 11
12 the outset of independence Dudayev's regime did not enjoy the same
13
14 domestic legitimacy as the other two secessionist movements due to electoral 15
16 fraud, autocratic pressures, and inability to deliver internal security.
17
18 19 20 21
22
23
24

25 Preoccupied with holding his grip on power, Dudayev invested little effort in 26
27 the diaspora. For instrumental reasons he still forged links with influential 28
29 individuals, such as the Russian-based Yaragi Mamadayev, who owned the 30
31 biggest construction company in Chechnya and is believed to have mobilized 32
33 political support for Dudayev (Lieven 1999). Moreover, during the first two 34
35 years after independence the Chechen mafia enjoyed a silent blessing from 36
37 the authorities, and reached its peak of local influence in the first two years
38
39 after independence (Gall and De Waal 1998). The diaspora was weak as well.
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47 48
49
50
51
52

53 Chechens in Western Europe were few at the time. Chechens from Central 54
55 Asia and Ukraine returned to Chechnya spontaneously rather than in an 56
57 organized way (Lieven 1999). Primarily through charities, Sufi networks 58
59
60

1
2
3
4 connected diaspora Chechens to the homeland (Chauffor 2005).
5
6

7 It is difficult to establish the exact links between the strategic centers
8
9
10 and the clandestine networks. Observable implications suggest that such 11
12
13 networks—enhanced by clan-based and extended family structures—played 14
15
16 an important role in establishing these connections. Mafia networks in both 17
18
19 the Chechen and Armenian cases emerged from the rising corruption in the 20
21
22 Soviet Union since the 1970s, when criminal elements became fused with 23
24
25 nomenklatura circles (Suny 1993). Voluntary or imposed remittances from 26
27
28 Kosovars abroad and underground economic activities accounted for 70 per 29
30
31 cent of Kosovo's entire economy (Adamson 2005).
32
33
34 35
36 37
38

39 During the initial formation of transnational coalitions, diaspora 40
41
42 members engaged primarily with a 'contained contentious repertoire', 43
44
45 characterized by financial contributions and lobbying.⁷ Financially, Kosovars 46
47
48 contributed 3 per cent of their incomes to the parallel structures. The 49
50
51 Armenian Fund collected diaspora contributions for both Armenia and 52
53
54 Karabakh. While no major diaspora lobby efforts were visible in the Chechen 55
56
57 case, religious charities became a venue for activism. In terms of lobbying, the 58
59
60

1
2
3
4 AACL facilitated contacts between American senators and Albanian political 5
6
7 figures from Kosovo, Albania and Macedonia (Hockenos 2003). It exerted
8
9
10 limited impact on the US administration to pass the 1992 'Christmas 11
12
13 Ultimatum'—a short telegram warning Serbia that the US would employ 14
15
16 military force if a conflict erupted in Kosovo (Sullivan 2004). The Armenian 17
18
19 diaspora influenced the 1992 passage of two acts by the US Congress—the 20 21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31 32
33
34 35
36 37
38
39 40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47 48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

Humanitarian Aid Corridor Act and Section 907 from the Freedom Support Act—aimed at preventing the US from rendering financial assistance to Azerbaijan due to its blockade on Armenia and Karabakh. This was a remarkable achievement, given the strong US interests in Azerbaijani oil.

Process 3: Grave Violations of Human Rights Radicalize Diasporas

Massacres, pogroms, and ethnic cleansing in the homeland serve as transformative events prompting diasporas to shift from contained to transgressive contention. Diasporas expand their repertoire to include fundraising for weapons, drafting of fighters, and aiding radical factions in the homeland. Formerly inactive diaspora members become mobilized. In short, a

1
2
3
4 communal threat prompts a communal response from diaspora circles.
5
6
7
8
9

10 -----FIGURE 3 HERE -----
11
12
13

14 How does this shift in contention take place? As Carment et al argue, 15
16 conflict escalation could occur through diffusion by way of information flows 17
18 and transnational media (2006). Global media cover extensively grave 19 20 violations of human rights, and indirectly expose diasporas to images of 21
22 mutilated bodies, burials, and vandalized religious places. While such reports 23
24 may trigger limited response from international organizations, they have a 25
26 magnifying effect on diaspora populations. With their real or 'imagined'
27
28 affective linkages to kin and identity locked in a collective trauma, diasporas 29
30 experience powerful emotions of fear, anger and threat to their collective 31
32 identity. Such emotions become instrumental in firming a population's resolve 33
34 to use violence (Petersen 2002). As Goldstone and Tilly (2001) argue, 35
36 attribution of threat becomes a powerful mechanism mobilizing against 37
38 repression 'when the costs of not acting seem to be too great'.
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47 48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

In Kosovo, grave human rights violations occurred in February 1998,

1
2
3
4 when Serbian military units massacred an entire extended family of a KLA
5
6
7 commander in the Drenica region. This became a transformative event. In late
8
9
10 March, more than 100,000 people demonstrated in front of Yugoslav 11
12
13 embassies in major European and US cities (Hockenos 2003). The Homeland 14
15
16 Calling Fund, established initially in Europe, shifted to the US where 17
18
19 Albanians were more affluent. In New York, the roofer Florin Krasniqi 20
21
22 fundraised for military equipment (Sullivan 2004). The US-based 'Atlantic 23
24
25 Battalion' was formed to deliver fighters to Kosovo. Also, at least two busses 26
27
28 of volunteers left from the UK, and others were drafted from Germany and 29
30
31 Switzerland. The Drenica massacre gave additional credibility to the radicals, 32
33
34 since in US public discourse they were not treated as 'terrorists,' but as 35
36
37 fighters against a repressive regime (Sullivan 2004).
38
39 40
41
42
43
44
45

46
47 In the Chechen case, the 1994 Russian invasion inflicted massive 48
49
50 casualties and mobilized previously inactive diasporas in Jordan and Turkey.
51

52
53
54 In Jordan, a newly formed Committee for the Support of the Chechen
55
56
57 Republic organized solidarity rallies, sit-ins, charity bazaars, and humanitarian 58

59
60 aid. It also appealed to leaders in the US, France, Middle East and Asia to

1
2
3
4 stop the violence (Shishani and Moore 2005). In Turkey, around 80 North 5
6
7
8 Caucasian diaspora organizations – most notably the umbrella Confederation 9
10
11 of Mountain Peoples of the North Caucasus – provided financial support to 12
13
14 Chechen rebels (Trenin and Malashenko 2004). Family patriarchs told young 15
16
17 men of Caucasian origin to fight in honor of the ‘ancestral’ homeland (Williams 18
19
20 and Altindag 2005). Jihadi web-sites featured the death of ‘martyrs’ and 21
22
23 stressed their Chechen origin (ibid). Wounded warriors enjoyed medical 24
25
26 treatment in Turkey, most notably the Chechen propaganda Chief Movladi 27
28
29 Ugudov (Trenin and Malashenko 2004).
30
31 32
33
34

35
36 In the Armenia/Karabakh case grave violations of human rights took 37
38
39 place in 1992 when the Azeri army still had an upper hand in the conflict (ICG 40
41
42 2004). Paradoxically, the Armenian diaspora sent less than 200 Armenian 43
44
45 fighters to Karabakh (Panossian 1998). The majority of external fighters came 46
47
48 from Armenia, and some from Lebanon. Such behavior can largely be 49
50
51 explained by Armenia’s military involvement in the war, rendering military 52
53
54 support from other sources less relevant. Nevertheless, some diaspora 55
56
57
58
59
60 members sponsored the war effort, especially in 1992 when the Azeri army

1
2
3
4 advanced on Armenian territory (Anonymous 2007). Civilian efforts were more
5
6
7 visible, expanding to include humanitarian aid, increased lobbying and major
8
9
10 individual contributions (ICG 2004).
11
12

13
14 One can rightly argue that grave violations of human rights do not 15
16 necessarily trigger massive radicalization in diaspora circles. Indeed, the 1988
17
18 Azeri pogroms against Armenians in suburbs of Azerbaijan's capital Baku left 19
20 between 19 and 26 people killed, hundreds injured, and 14,000 refugees (De 21
22 Waal 2003). The pogroms did not trigger diaspora political action, although 23
24 they shocked it profoundly (Libaridian 1999).
25
26
27
28
29
30
31 32
33

34
35 The answer to this puzzle is that timing and sequencing of 36
37 transformative events matter for diaspora radicalization. If grave violations of 38
39 human rights take place prior to diasporas' engagement in a conflict spiral, 40
41 they are less likely to have a radicalizing effect than if they occur in its 42
43 aftermath. In the Armenian case, the diaspora did not understand the scope 44
45 and direction of the nationalist movement in 1988, but was already collectively
46
47 invested in Karabakh's independence in 1992.
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

Process 4: Diasporas Influence the Radicalization of Domestic Politics

Diasporas further influenced the radicalization of local politics when they reacted to another transformative event affecting the outcome of secessionism. In the Kosovo case, this transformative event was the 1995 Dayton Peace Agreement which did not include a solution for Kosovo, and so delegitimized LDK's non-violent strategy. In the Armenian/Karabakh case, this event was the 1994 cease-fire that ended the war between Armenia and Azerbaijan. Although Armenia de facto won that war, its victory did not translate into a new international status for Karabakh. In the Chechen case, this transformative event was the end of the first Chechen war in 1996. While the war ended with Russia's de facto defeat, Chechnya was not granted legal independence. In the aftermath of these events, local elites started losing credibility that they could achieve the secessionist goal.

--- FIGURE 4 HERE -----

These transformative events started eroding the already established transnational coalitions. Alternative identity entrepreneurs reached out for diaspora support. Although all diasporas eventually exerted radicalization influences on homeland politics, the mechanisms through which they arrived there were different. In the Kosovo case ethnic outbidding took place (Adamson 2009), centered on a clash of strategies. After Dayton, LDK's leadership weakened domestically. A rift opened between President Rugova and Prime Minister Bukoshi, leading to internal competition for influence within diaspora circles and reduced contributions for the parallel structures (ICG 1998). KLA operatives used this rift to infuse their

1
2
3
4 own vision for a change of strategy from non-violence to guerilla warfare.
5
6

7 Bukoshi (2002) argued that he proposed the KLA to join efforts with the exiled
8
9
10
11 government in order to receive funding and international legitimacy. The KLA 12
13
14 rejected his proposition and started building its own networks, considering 15
16
17
18 'Rugova and company as traitors' (Thaci 2002).
19 20
21

22 The diaspora shifted its support from the shadow government to the 23
24
25 KLA in 1998. Major voluntary contributions started flowing from the US, 26
27
28 Canada, Australia, Germany and Switzerland. A single charitable event in 29
30
31
32 New York, Michigan, California and Alaska raised USD 16,000-56,000 (Judah 33
34
35 2000). Diaspora funds were often used to purchase cheap AK-47s from the 36
37
38 black market. Procured arms helped guerillas within Kosovo to stage attacks 39
40
41
42 on Serbian police stations. As Serbia deployed more military and paramilitary 43
44
45 units, Albanian villagers fled and Serbian troops looted their houses. This 46
47
48 tactic served as 'the most effective recruitment drive the KLA could have 49
50
51
52 hoped for' (Sullivan, 2004).
53
54
55
56

57 Ethnic outbidding was possible as a mechanism emanating from a 58
59
60 strong strategic center extending local political processes into the

1
2
3
4 transnational realm. In the two other cases the strategic center was not strong 5
6
7
8 enough to have a powerful transnational effect. The transnational coalitions
9
10
11 dissipated through different mechanisms. In the Armenian/Karabakh case 12
13
14
15 dissipation stemmed from a clash of interests between a weak strategic center
16
17
18 and a powerful diaspora. The first move of diaspora withdrawal was in 1992, 19
20
21 when the diaspora-appointed Foreign Minister Hovannisian resigned in 22
23
24
25 opposition to governmental policies concerning Turkey. Locked into its 26
27
28 traumatic identity, the Armenian diaspora insisted that Turkey's recognition of 29
30
31 the 1915 genocide precede any rapprochement with Armenia. Further 32
33
34
35 diaspora resentment followed ARF's ban as a political party in 1995 on the 36
37
38 grounds that it was foreign-based and funded. This move boosted ARF's 39
40
41 domestic and international reputation, following a well known effect: weak 42
43
44 repression used against well-mobilized groups often boosts the reputation of 45
46
47 the repressed. As a result, the ARF mobilized its wide international networks 48
49
50
51 in a sustained anti-government campaign (Panossian 1998). Although major 52
53
54
55 domestic factors such as internal party opposition, economic scarcities, and a 56
57
58 militarized economy led to the successful 1998 palace coup against 59
60

1
2
3
4 Petrossian, diaspora entrepreneurs did contribute to the radicalization of local 5
6
7 politics. With their support, former fighters in the Karabakh war – most notably 8
9
10
11 former Armenian President Robert Kocharian – entered office.
12

13
14 In the Chechen case the already weak coalition dissipated through a 15
16
17
18 clash of values between a secular Chechen diaspora and growing Islamism 19
20
21 within the country. Shortly after the first war, Dudayev was assassinated and 22
23
24 an Islamist opposition under Shamil Basayev picked up the banner of 25
26
27 secessionism. Using a religious rather than ethno-national appeal, the 28
29
30 strategic center attracted a growing body of Wahhabi fighters from Saudi 31
32
33 Arabia, other Middle Eastern countries and Pakistan (Murphy 2004). A shift of 34
35
36 support from a nationality-based to a religious diaspora occurred for two 37
38
39 reasons. Unlike Albanians or Armenians, Chechens lived primarily in Russia, 40
41
42 and were vulnerable to repression. Targeted police interventions demolished 43
44
45 offices of a Chechen cultural center, and backed other criminal groups, hence 46
47
48 diminishing both civic and mafia influences (Lieven 1999, RFE/RL 2002).
49
50
51 Moreover, the secular values of a Chechen diaspora were challenged by 52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60 radical Islamic ideas emanating from within Chechnya, most notably the

1
2
3
4 introduction of Sharia Law (Tishkov 2004).
5
6
7
8

9 10 Conclusion

11 This article sought to deepen the understanding of how diasporas exert a 12 radicalizing impact on secessionist conflicts in their homelands. I argued that 13
14 despite differences in diaspora communal characteristics and the secessionist 15
16 conflicts themselves, a common pattern of diaspora mobilization emerges.
17
18 19 20 21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31 32
33
34 35
36 37
38
39 40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47 48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60
Diasporas exert radicalizing influences on homeland politics at two specific junctures – when grave violations of human rights occur in the homeland and when local moderate elites start losing credibility that they can achieve the secessionist goal.
Diasporas become a radicalization force only after engaging in a conflict spiral and influencing it by participating in four mobilization processes. First, they enter the conflict spiral after local secessionists proclaim independence. Although individual diaspora members may be connected to secessionists prior to the declaration of independence, diasporas endorse secessionism en masse only in its aftermath.
Independence becomes a focal point for mobilization because it triggers mechanisms connecting traumatic parts of the diasporic identity to messages of injustice developed by the local elites. Secondly, local secessionists broker transnational coalitions with major diaspora organizations and influential individuals. These coalitions endure to varying degrees depending on the strength of the secessionist strategic center vis-à-vis the diaspora institutions. A third process is triggered by grave violations of human rights, which become a transformative event for diaspora mobilization. Exposed to large-scale violence through the international media, diasporas attribute threat to their

1
2
3 conflict-generated traumatic identities. Diaspora entrepreneurs expand contention to a
4 larger circle of participants and to transgressive practices. Finally, established
5 transnational coalitions start to dissipate when local secessionists begin losing 6 credibility that they can achieve the secessionist goal. Different mechanisms drive this 7 process: ethnic outbidding and clash over strategy (Kosovo), clash over interests
8 (Karabakh), and clash over values (Chechnya). As a result, diasporas switch their 9 allegiance to more radical competitors.
10
11 12
13
14
15
16
17
18

19
20 How generalizable are these findings? As mentioned earlier, this study limited 21 the scope of inquiry to conflict-generated diasporas linked to secessionist cases in the 22 post-communist world, anchored in autonomous regions seeking self-determination
23 from ethno-national federations. In this sense, these findings make narrow claims
24 related to the Albanian, Armenian, and Chechen cases.
25
26
27
28
29
30

31
32 Nevertheless, I maintain that these findings have relevance to a broader 33 universe of cases. While grave human rights violations radicalize diaspora politics, if 34 they take place before a diaspora is mobilized in a conflict spiral, they are less likely 35 to have a strong radicalizing impact. By being part of the conflict spiral, diaspora 36 organizations and individuals become emotionally and financially invested in the 37 desired political outcome, as in the Armenian case. A slightly modified variant is 38 manifested in the case of the Sikh diaspora with regard to Khalistan. As Fair writes, 39 diaspora support for the conflict peaked in response to the Indian army invasion of a 40 major Sikh temple in 1984. But because the diaspora was not well mobilized to 41 support the insurgents, the momentum was quickly lost (2007).
42
43
44
45
46
47 48
49
50
51
52
53
54

55
56 Furthermore, the strength of a strategic center and the strength of the diaspora
57 institutions matter in relationship to each other. A strong Armenian ARF and a weak
58 Armenian state resemble a strong Israeli lobby, AIPAC, and an Israeli state, stronger 59
60

1
2
3 than the Armenian, but still relatively weak with regard to its diaspora. The existence
4 of two major poles could predict strong clashes of interests, as Shain observed in 5
6
7
8
9
10
11 12
13
14
15
16
17
18 19 20 21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31 32
33
34 35
36 37
38
39 40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47 48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

than the Armenian, but still relatively weak with regard to its diaspora. The existence of two major poles could predict strong clashes of interests, as Shain observed in 2002. However, in many other cases, including Kosovo and Chechnya, the strategic centers were stronger than the diaspora institutions. For example, during the 1992-1995 war in Bosnia-Herzegovina, the Croatian center was strong and the diaspora institutions were weaker. Thus, local political processes were transplanted into diaspora politics.

Grave violations of human rights and loss of credibility of local actors could be good predictors that diasporas will expand their transgressive contentious repertoire and that transnational coalitions may dissipate when facing more radical competitors. For example, the 2008 Israeli bombing of Gaza created a large-scale mobilization of the Palestinian diaspora. The moderate Palestinian Authority lost large-scale support in diaspora circles, while its radical Islamic competitor, Hamas, gained new support.

The last two points relate to my policy recommendations. When grave violations of human rights occur in violent conflicts, and when local actors start losing credibility, international policy-makers largely focus on how to provide humanitarian aid to refugees, broker cease-fires, and support moderates. They pay little attention to the radicalization of diaspora politics in their own liberal states that occurs simultaneously to peace-building initiatives. Creating policies to address the specific timing of clashing external influences on the conflict spiral could aid the overall peace-building effort.

Bibliography

1
2
3
4 ADAMSON, FIONA 2005 'Globalization, transnational political mobilization,
5
6
7 and networks of violence', Cambridge Review of International Affairs, vol.18, 8
9
10 no.1, pp.31-49.

11
12
13
14 ----- 2009 'Mechanisms of diaspora mobilization, Paper presented at Simon Fraser 15
16 University, October.

17
18 AMINZADE, RON and DOUG MCADAM 2001 'Emotions and contentious politics', 19
20 in Ron Aminzade et al. (eds), Silence and Voice in the Study of Contentious Politics, 21
22 Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, pp.14-50.

23
24
25
26 ANDERSON, BENEDICT 1998 Spectre of Comparisons, London: Verso.

27
28 ANONYMOUS 2007 Telephone interview with the author, 17 February.

29
30 BOB, CLIFFORD 2005 Marketing of Rebellion, Cambridge: Cambridge University 31
32 Press.

33
34
35 BRAUER, BIRGIT 2002 'Chechens and the survival of their cultural identity in 36
37 exile', Journal of Genocide Research, vol. 4 no.3, pp.387-400.

38
39
40 BRUBAKER, ROGERS 1996 Nationalism Reframed, Cambridge: Cambridge 41
42 University Press.

43
44 ----- 2005 'The "diaspora" diaspora', Ethnic and Racial Studies vol.28, no.1, pp.1-45
46 19.

47
48
49 BUKOSHI, BUJAR 2002 Former Prime Minister, Kosovo Shadow Government, 50
51 Interview with the author, 7 October, Prishtina, Kosovo.

52
53
54 BUNCE, VALERIE 1999 Subversive Institutions, Cambridge: Cambridge University 55
56 Press.

1
2
3
4 BYMAN, DANIEL et al. 2001 Trends in Outside Support for Insurgent Movements,

5
6
7 Santa Monica: Rand.

8
9 CARMENT, DAVID and JAMES, PATRICK 2000 'Explaining third-party
10
11 intervention in ethnic conflict', Nations and Nationalism, vol.6, no.2, pp. 173-202.

12
13
14 CARMENT, DAVID, JAMES, PATRICK and TAYDAS, ZEYNEP 2006 Who 15
16
17 Intervenues? Columbus: Ohio University Press.

18
19 20
21 CDS 2002 Understanding the Albanian Diaspora, Occasional Paper, Kings College 22
23
24 London, July.

25
26 CHAUFFOUR, CELIA 2005 'Laurent Vinatier', 15 October, <http://www.caucas.com>

27
28 CHAZAN, NAOMI (ed) 1991 Irredentism and International Politics. Boulder: Lynne 29
30
31 Rienner.

32
33 COLLIER, PAUL and HOFFLER, ANKE 2000 'Greed and grievances in civil 34
35
36 war', World Bank: Policy Paper 2355.

37
38
39 DELLA PORTA, DONATELLA and TARROW, SIDNEY(eds) 2005 Transnational 40
41
42 Protest and Global Activism, Lanham: Rowman and Littlefield.

43
44 DE WAAL, THOMAS 2003 Black Garden, New York: New York University 45
46
47
48 Press.

49
50
51 FAIR, CHRISTINE 2005 'Diaspora involvement in insurgencies', Nationalism 52
53
54
55
56
57 and Ethnic Politics, vol.11, no.1, pp.127-47.

58
59
60 GALL, CAROLOTTA and DE WAAL, THOMAS 1998 Chechnya, New York: New York University Press.

1
2
3 GAMSON, WILLIAM 1992 Talking Politics, New York: Cambridge University
4 Press.
5

6
7
8 GEORGE, ALEXANDER and BENNETT, ANDREW 2004 Case Studies and Theory
9
10 Development in the Social Sciences, Cambridge: MIT Press.
11

12
13 GOLDSTONE, JACK and TILLY, CHARLES 2001 'Threat (and opportunity)' in 14 Aminzade et al. (eds), Silence and Voice in the Study of Contentious Politics, 15 Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, pp.179-194.
16
17

18
19
20 HERACLIDES, ALEXIS 1990 'Secessionist minorities and external involvement', 21
22 International Organization, vol.44, no.3, pp.341-78.
23

24
25 HESS, DAVID and MARTIN, BRIAN 2006 'Repression, backfire, and the theory of 26
27 transformative events', Mobilization, vol.11, no.2, pp.249-267.
28

29
30 HOCKENOS, PAUL 2003 Homeland Calling, Ithaca: Cornell University Press.

31
32 HOROWITZ, DONALD 1991 'Irredentas and secessions', in Chazan (ed.), 33
34 Irredentism and International Politics, Boulder: Lynne Rienner, pp.10-11.
35

36
37 ICG 1998 Kosovo Spring, <http://www.crisisgroup.org>.

38
39 ---- 2004 'Armenia: internal instability ahead.' Europe Report, no. 158, 40
41
42 <http://www.crisisgroup.org>.

43
44 JENNE, ERIN 2007 Ethnic Bargaining, Ithaca: Cornell University Press.

45
46
47 JUDAH, TIM 2000 Kosovo. War and Revenge, New Haven: Yale University Press.
48

49
50 KAILANI, WASFI 2002 'Chechens in the Middle East' BSCIA, Harvard, 51
52 http://bcsia.ksg.harvard.edu/publication.cfm?ctype=event_reports&item_id=98 53

54
55
56 KECK, KATHRYN and SIKKINK, MARGARET 1998 Activists Beyond Borders, 57
58 Ithaca: Cornell University Press.
59
60

1
2
3 KOSTA, BARJABA 2004 'Albania: Looking Beyond Borders', Migration
4
5 Information Service, <http://www.migrationinformation.org/Profiles/print.cfm?ID=239>
6
7

8 LIBARIDIAN, GERARD 1999 Challenge of Statehood. Watertown: Blue Crane.
9

10 LIEVEN, ANATOL 1999. Chechnya. Tombstone of Russian Power, New Haven: 11
12 Yale University Press.
13

14 LYONS, TERRENCE 2006 'Diasporas and homeland conflict', in Miles Kahler and 15
16 Barbara Walter (eds), Territoriality and Conflict, Cambridge: Cambridge University 17
18 Press, pp.111-29.
19 20
21

22 MURPHY, PAUL 2004 Wolves of Islam, Washington: Brassey's.
23

24 PAYIN, EMIL and ARKADY POPOV 1996 'Chechnya from past to present', 25
26 Chechen Republic Online, <http://www.amina.com/article/history.html>.
27
28

29 PANOSSIAN, RAZMIK 1998 'The Armenians', in Charles King and Neil Melvin 30
31 (eds), Nations Abroad, London: Westview, pp.79-102.
32
33

34 PETERSEN, ROGER 2002 Understanding Ethnic Violence, Cambridge: Cambridge 35
36 University Press.
37
38

39 RFE/RL Newsline, 25 October 2002.
40
41

42 RISSE, THOMAS et al. 1999 Power of Human Rights, Cambridge: Cambridge 43
44 University Press.
45
46

47 SAIDEMAN, STEPHEN 2001 Ties that Divide, New York: Columbia University 48
49 Press.
50
51

52 SIKKINK, KATHRYN 2005 'Patterns of dynamic multilevel governance' in Della 53
54 Porta et al. (eds), Transnational Protest and Global Activism, Lanham: Rowman and 55
56 Littlefield, pp.151-173.
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 SHAIN, YOSSI 2002 'The role of diasporas in conflict perpetuation and resolution',
4
5
6 SAIS Review, vol.2, no.2, pp.115-144.

7
8 SHEFFER, GABRIEL 2003 Diaspora Politics, Cambridge: Cambridge University 9
10 Press.

11
12
13 SCHELLING, THOMAS 1960 Strategy of Conflict, Cambridge: Harvard 14
15
16 University Press.

17
18 SHISHANI, MURAD and MOORE, CERWYN 2005 'Jordan and Chechnya' 19 20
21
22 Prague Watchdog, http://www.watchdog.cz/?show=000000-000004-000003- 23
24
25
26 000117&lang=1

27
28
29
30 SKRBIC, ZLATKO 2007 'The mobilized Croatian diaspora' in Hazel Smith and 31
32
33 Paul Stares (eds), Diasporas and Conflict, Tokyo: UN University Press, 34
35
36
37 pp.218-238.

38
39
40 SMITH, HAZEL and PAUL STARES (eds) 2007 Diasporas and Conflict, 41
42
43
44 Tokyo: UN University Press.

45
46
47 SULLIVAN, STACEY 2004 Be Not Afraid, New York: St. Martin's.

48
49
50 TARAS, RAY and GANGULY, RAJAT 2006 Understanding Ethnic Conflict, 51
52
53
54 New York: Longman.

55
56
57 TARROW, SIDNEY 2005 The New Transnational Activism, Cambridge: Cambridge 58
59
60 University Press.

1
2
3 THACI, HASHIM 2002 Former KLA Commander-in-Chief, Interview with the 4
5
6 author, 8 October, Prishtina, Kosovo.

7
8 TISHKOV, VALERY 2004 Chechnya, Berkley: University of California Press.

9
10
11 TÖLÖLYAN, KHACIG 2000 'Elites and institutions in the Armenian 12
13
14 transnation,' Diaspora, vol.9, no.1, pp.107-36.

15
16
17
18 TRENIN, DMITRI and MALASHENKO, ALEKSI 2004 Russia's Restless Frontier, 19 20 Washington: Carnegie.

21
22 WESSELING, EGBERT 1997 The North Caucasian Diaspora in Turkey, 23
24
25 <http://www.kapba.de/CaucasianDiaspora.html>

26
27 WAYLAND, SARAH 2004 'Ethno-nationalist networks', Review of International 28
29
30 Studies, vol.30, no.3, pp. 405-426.

31
32 WILLIAMS, BRIAN and ALTINDAG, FEYZA 2005 'Turkish volunteers in 33
34 Chechnya', Terrorism Monitor, Jamestown Foundation, vol. 3, no. 7.

35
36 37
38
39 MARIA KOINOVA is Assistant Professor at the University of Amsterdam.
40
41 ADDRESS: Department of Political Science, University of Amsterdam, 42
43 O.Z. Achterburgwal 237, 1012 DL Amsterdam, The Netherlands.
44
45 Email: m.v.koinova@uva.nl

46
47
48 ¹ Armenia has not yet recognized Karabakh, but Karabakh citizens carry Armenian passports, use
49 Armenian currency, and war-time leaders occupy important political positions.

50
51 ² Estimated numbers of Armenians: Russia (2,000,000), US (800,000), Georgia (400,000), France
52 (250,000), Lebanon (105,000), Iran (100,000), Ukraine (70,000), Argentina (60,000), Turkey (60,000), 53 Canada (40,000), Australia (30,000) (Tölölyan, 2000).

54
55 ³ Estimated numbers of Albanians: US (250,000), Switzerland (150,000), Germany (350,000), Italy
56 (250,000), Turkey (250,000) (CDS, 2002).

57
58 ⁴ Estimated numbers of Chechens: Turkey (100,000), Jordan (8,000), Egypt (5,000), Syria (4,000), Iraq
59 (2,500) (Kailani 2002); Russia and the Former Soviet Union (300,000) (Lieven 1999). Jordan:
60 Circassians (95,000), and Chechens (15,000) (Wesseling 1997).

⁵ I adapt Schelling's (1960) understanding of a focal point's importance for mobilization under information deficiencies.

⁶ According to Tilly and Tarrow, claim-making is the ‘claim bearing on someone else’s interests, leading to coordinated efforts and programs, in which governments are involved, initiators of claims or third parties’ (2007).

⁷ ‘Contained contention’ entails ‘well established means of claim making’ in episodic, public, and collective interaction with other claim makers. Goals are achieved through peaceful means. Politics becomes ‘transgressive’ when collective claims expand to include more extreme agendas, verbal and physical violence (McAdam et al, 2001).

For Peer Review Only

1
2
3
4
5
6
7
8
9
10
11 12
13
14
15
16
17
18 19 20 21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31 32
33
34 35
36 37
38
39 40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47 48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

Diasporas and Secessionist Conflicts

Table 1

Major Diaspora Characteristics

Diaspora	Age	Spread	Size*	Institutionalization
Armenian	Classic: Prior to the modern period, large-scale after 1915	Global	ca 4 million*	High level: entrenched divisions between two major blocks.
Albanian	Modern: Early 20th century, mostly after 1989	Predominantly Western hemisphere	More than 1 million	Middle level: Primarily as of the mid-1980s
Chechen	Incipient: during communism and after 1989	Predominantly Russia and former Soviet republics, Middle East	Ca 420,000	Low level: little institutionalization apart from Russia

These numbers represent conservative estimates and incorporate multiple generations of migrants. Thus, they do not directly relate to the much narrower scope of this study's definition considering a 'diaspora' only those members of a community who make a diasporic claim.

* Tölölyan, p.107.;  Kosta, 2004, Sheffer, p.106.;  Lieven, p.100, Kailani, 2002; Brauer, pp.387-400.

Web-links to Chronologies on the Secessionist Conflicts

Kosovo: http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Kosovo_War

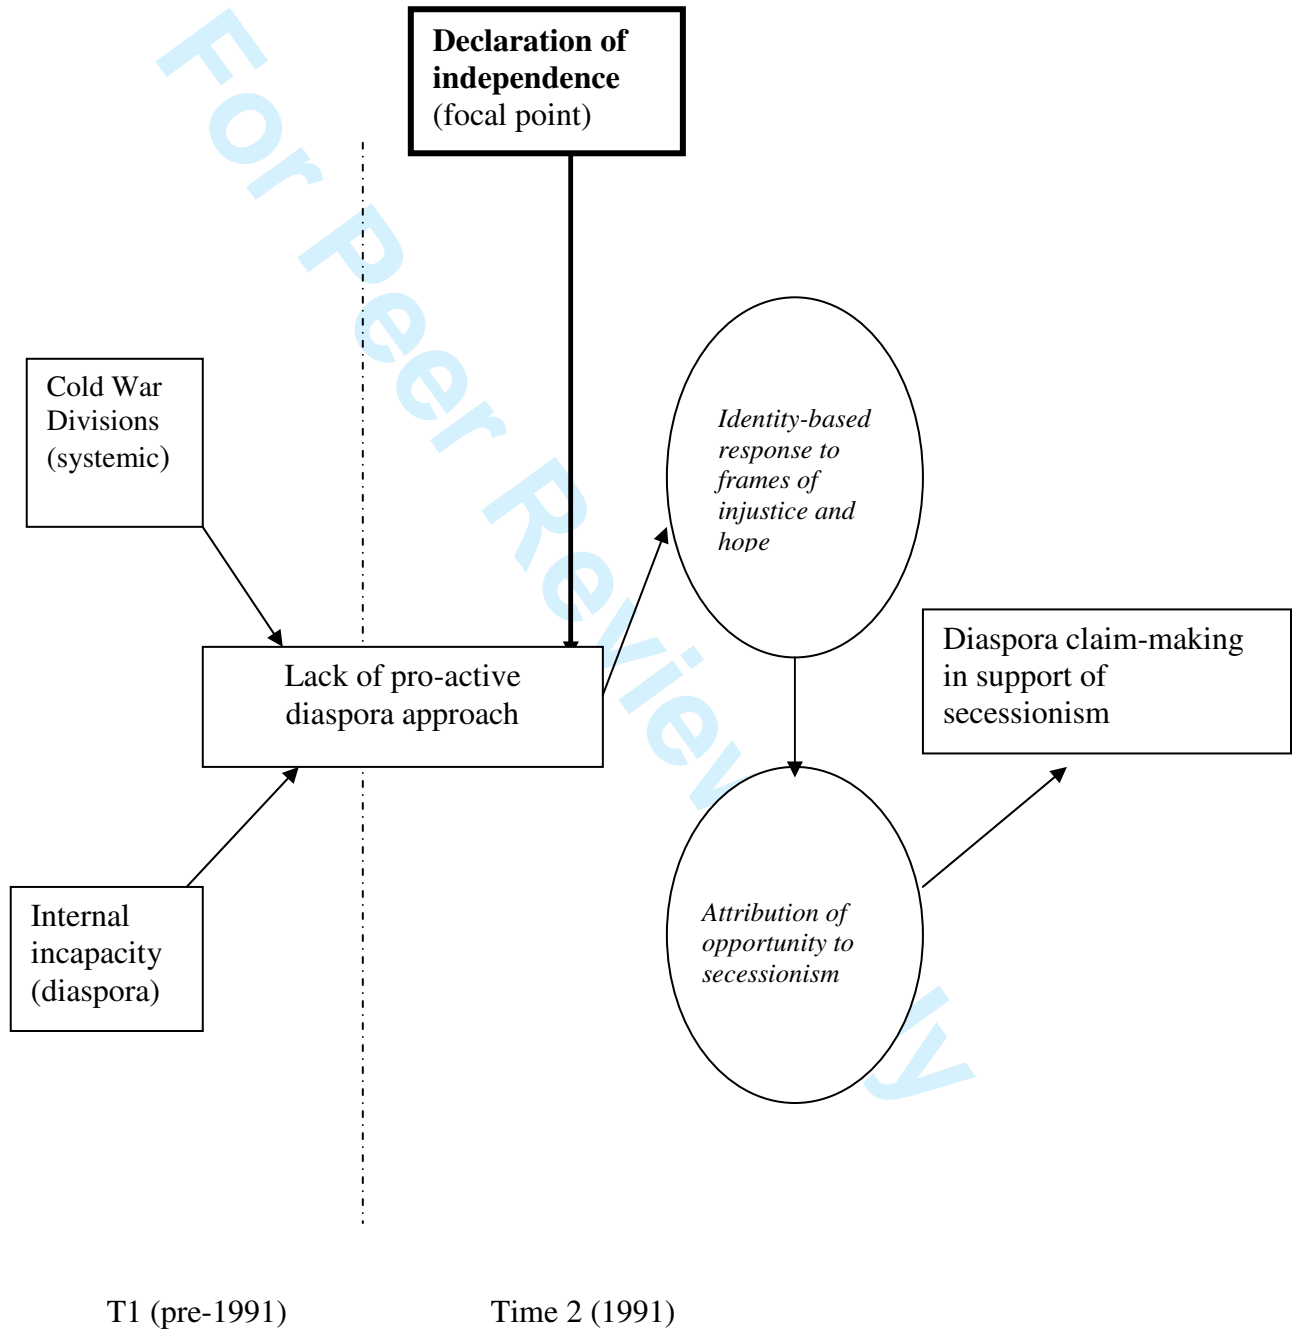

Karabakh: http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Nagorno-Karabakh_War

Chechnya: http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Second_Chechen_War

Diasporas and Secessionist Conflicts

Figure 1

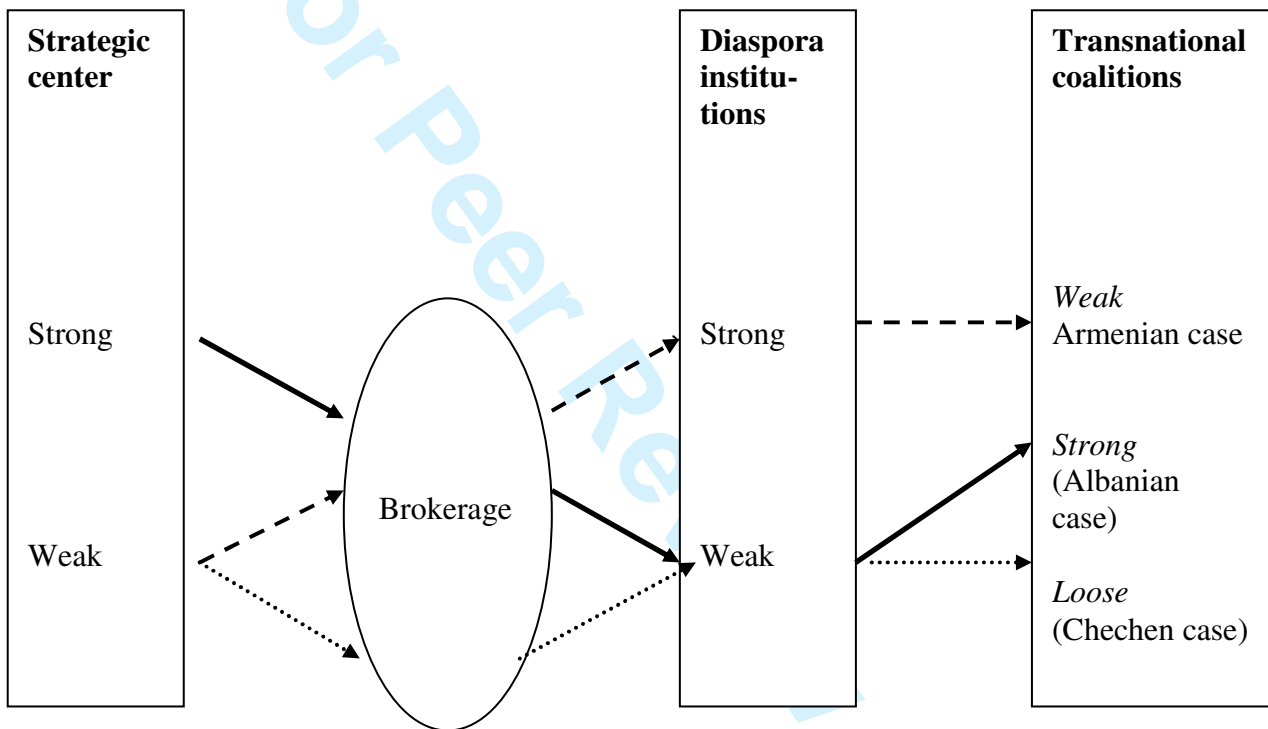

Process 1: Diasporas Engagement in a Conflict Spiral

Diasporas and Secessionist Conflicts

Figure 2

Process 2: Building Transnational Coalitions

Diasporas and Secessionist Conflicts

Figure 3

Mobilization Step 3: Grave Violations of Human Rights Radicalize Diasporas

Diasporas and Secessionist Conflicts

Figure 4

Process 4:

Diasporas Influence the Radicalization of Domestic Politics

